2. LITERATURE REVIEW
Literature has recognized that history and heritage are interlinked as “Heritage is the modern way of using the elements of the past” (Timothy & Boyd, 2003). “Heritage is what present society chooses to inherit and to pass on to the coming generations and history is what a historian regards as something which is worth recording” (Turnbridge & Asworth, 1996).

The National Trust defines heritage tourism as “traveling to experience the places, artifacts, and activities that authentically represent the stories of the past and present. It includes cultural, historic and natural resources” (National Trust for Historic Preservation, 2008).

In addition to the physical objects and places of heritage there are various practices of heritage that are conserved or transferred from one generation to the next. These invisible or ‘intangible’ practices of heritage, such as language, culture, popular song, literature or dress, are as important in helping us to understand our society. Heritage is the things of value, which are inherited from our past generations. If the value is of community or national, we speak of our heritage. (Edgell, 2006).

According to Ahmed in 2006, Heritage places are those, which help an understanding of the past; enrich the present and which will be of value to the future generations. For the places of archeological and architectural values, it is the people and activities that form the cultural heritage.

Explaining Heritage tourism, Silberberg in 1995 defined that Heritage Tourism is a tool of economic development that achieves economic growth through attracting visitors from outside a host community, who are motivated wholly or in part by interest in the historical, artistic, scientific or lifestyle/heritage offerings of a community, region, group or institution.

In addition to the above, Chang in 1999 defined that; Heritage tourism can satisfy the cultural and leisure aspirations of the local community, providing residents with a greater sense of belonging to their homeland as well as intercultural awareness both within and outside a community.

Cultural and heritage tourists stay longer and spend more money than other kinds of travelers thus making such tourism an important economic development tool (Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, 2002).

Professor Simon Thurley, Institute of Historical Research, UK, has said and explained that Heritage is a production factor in an economy, thus it is an asset and not a liability, in relation to the European Study, Professor Thurley has mentioned and explained categorically that Investing in cultural heritage will help strengthen Europe’s economy, with the benefits extending far beyond tourism.

Professor Thurley’s Heritage Cycle diagram (Fig. 1) as explained by Sarah May (2019), is actually a model where appreciation of heritage leads to a desire to protect it, which in turn leads to further appreciation for that heritage site and other cultural aspects related to it. This Heritage Cycle Diagram is such an important piece of study and a guide to the policy maker, and implementer, which could usher in a new era in field of converting heritage tourism as an important component of economy.
Across the world, several countries are increasingly becoming dependent on tourism, as it is one of the most rational and sustainable development choices that have the capability of creating employment to the communities and also acting as a main provision of foreign earnings to the economy (UNWTO, 2010 – Tourism and the Millennium Development Goals). Increasing competitiveness amongst countries has also pushed the business capacity of the tourism industry to the level of, or, sometimes even exceeding trade commodities such as oil and food exports (UNWTO, 2011). While it is often the economic impacts of tourism that businesses and public organizations that are usually interested in (Stynes, 1999), the late twentieth century saw the emergence of environmental and socio-cultural impacts of tourism being controversial and critical issues discussed in tourism study.

Peak periods of tourism can benefit the economy of a country, however on the expense of the locals, who might have to pay for the higher prices of goods and services in the community, thus increasing their cost of living. The contributions of tourism to a country’s economic benefits is relative to factors such as the availability of facilities and resources, the country’s social and political-stability, the host communities’ behavior towards tourist and the amount of investment injected by the government tourism projects and development (Youell, 1998). Heritage cycle actually helps in balancing these things, and if proper work is done in this field there is holistic development and preservation of Heritage & Culture of the region.
